The diagram illustrates the inheritance hierarchy (Wakōshi) in Japan, divided into four main levels of inheritance rights:

- First Priority (Children): Includes the spouse, former spouse, and others. It is further divided into two levels:
  - First Priority (Child): Inherits if the child is the only surviving child.
  - Second Priority (Child): Inherits if the child is not the only surviving child.
- Second Priority (Lineal Descendants): Includes the father and mother. The inheritance rights are divided into two levels:
  - First Priority (Lineal Descendant): Inherits if the lineal descendant is the only surviving lineal descendant.
  - Second Priority (Lineal Descendant): Inherits if the lineal descendant is not the only surviving lineal descendant.
- Third Priority (Blood Relatives): Includes brothers and sisters. It is further divided into two levels:
  - First Priority (Blood Relative): Inherits if the blood relative is the only surviving blood relative.
  - Second Priority (Blood Relative): Inherits if the blood relative is not the only surviving blood relative.
- Fourth Priority (Successors by Representation): Includes nephews and nieces. It is further divided into two levels:
  - First Priority (Successor by Representation): Inherits if the successor by representation is the only surviving successor by representation.
  - Second Priority (Successor by Representation): Inherits if the successor by representation is not the only surviving successor by representation.

Each level is represented by a box containing the inheritance rights, with dashed lines indicating the inheritance rights of each individual within that level.
